There is a growing literature base on the health and well-being of our care staff. Previous research has shown that our care staff experience high levels of stress and burnout, and a significant proportion of our staff have reported mental health problems in the past 12 months. A recent study by the Health Foundation (2015) found that care staff experience high levels of stress and burnout, and a significant proportion of our staff have reported mental health problems in the past 12 months. A recent study by the Health Foundation (2015) found that care staff experience high levels of stress and burnout, and a significant proportion of our staff have reported mental health problems in the past 12 months.

The eight studies provided only 1 year (mean) of follow-up, limiting the generalizability of the findings.
